polymerase (Pol) activity in normal somatic cells. These cells are severely deficient in Pol beta activity after treatment with DNA damage that is associated with carcinogenesis and the process of aging. However, somatic cells contain low levels of Pol beta activity compared to the postmeiotic germ cells in the mouse testis. The enzyme activity levels are about 10-50% of those in primary spermatocytes and round spermatids and then rise to about 60% of those in late pachytene spermatocytes, 12-14 weeks old. In spermatids the activity is lower than in round spermatids, in contrast to somatic cell type, where the decrease is associated with the differentiation of these cells. The differential pattern of Pol beta activity during germ cell differentiation is not supported by changes in the corresponding mRNA levels that are expressed in these cells. It is postulated that the differential regulation of Pol beta expression may be needed for the maintenance of genome
